

Fairbridge Farm Schools

A Brief Overview of the Fairbridge History 1909 – 2018

The Fairbridge Farm School was part of a philanthropic scheme aimed at strengthening the British Empire and improving the condition of underprivileged British Children. The scheme was conceived by Kingsley Ogilvie Fairbridge (1885-1924), a South African born reformer who was raised in southern Rhodesia.

On first visiting England in 1902 Fairbridge was struck by the over-crowding and poverty in large industrial cities; he was also appalled by the condition of working-class children who lived in unhealthy, unstable homes in city slums. In 1909, having returned to England as a Rhodes Scholar, he outlined his plans for saving these children to a group of fellow students at the Oxford University Colonial Club.

Fairbridge's plan was to resettle selected British children in the overseas dominions. There, in a rural environment, children would live together in cottages within a village-like setting. Girls would receive training in domestic pursuits, while boys would be trained in manual arts and agriculture. Vocational training was to be supplemented with moral guidance and leavened with recreational pursuits in such a way that the young emigrants would be able to take their places as productive citizens in the host communities.

Fairbridge's proposal led to the founding of the "Society for the Furtherance of Child Emigration to the Colonies," afterwards incorporated as the Child Emigration Society (CES). The society raised £2,000 and in 1913 the first "farm school" was opened in Western Australia at Pinjarra. Other training farms (which were supported by grants from the British and Australian governments and by private donations) were later established in the states of New South Wales, and Victoria.

Kingsley Fairbridge had hoped originally to open a farm school in Canada. Ten years after his death—when the CES was reconstituted as Fairbridge Farm Schools (Inc.)—his wish was realized. Encouraged by Canadian enthusiasts, an appeal was launched to help bring the farm school concept to the Dominion. The appeal was led by the Prince of Wales and sufficient funds were raised to purchase a 450 hectare site at Cowichan Station, south of Duncan, on Vancouver Island. The new facility—officially named The Prince of Wales Fairbridge Farm School—opened in 1935.

The first principal of the farm school was Major F. Trew who held the position from April 1935 to May 1936. Trew's successor was Colonel H.T. Logan, a contemporary of Kingsley Fairbridge at Oxford and a former professor of Classics at the University of British Columbia. Logan resigned in June 1945 to join the staff of the Fairbridge Society headquarters in London. He was succeeded as principal of the Prince of Wales farm school by Mr. W.J. Garnett (July 1945-January 1949 and Major A.H. Plows (February 1949-January 1951.)

The Fairbridge Farm School consisted of fourteen cottages, each capable of accommodating a dozen children and a resident "cottage mother". Other buildings included the principal's residence, staff quarters, a chapel, a hospital and a school. These facilities—which were adjacent to the school's large farm—were maintained with the help of subscriptions from England and a grant from the British Columbia government. Funds were also raised throughout the province and in 1938 Captain J.C. Dun-Waters donated his 800 hectare orchard and dairy farm near Vernon to the Fairbridge Society. Names Fintry Fairbridge Training Farm, the Okanagan property was run in conjunction with the main farm on Vancouver Island. Three hundred and twenty nine children passed through the Fairbridge Farm School during its operation. But after the Second World War a number of problems arose which placed the future of the school in doubt. Among these were the unfavourable dollar/sterling exchange rate, the post-war monetary controls which restricted funds from Britain, and the provincial government's decision to discontinue its operating grant. The whole concept of institutionalized child care was also being questioned in many quarters and after the passing of the 1948 Child Welfare Act in Britain [which was local authorities responsible for child care] there was no longer a need for juvenile resettlement on a large scale. The Fintry estate was sold and in the early 1950s the last of the Fairbridge "trainees" left the Prince of Wales Farm School.

For the next ten years the Cowichan Station site was managed on behalf of the Fairbridge Society by the Canada Colonization Association, a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The association leased the farm school cottages to newly-arrived English immigrant families. The arrangement was eventually discontinued and in 1975 the farm portion of the school was sold to the private farmer who was leasing the land, Mr. Gordon Greer while the home site sold to James A. Ellis owner of Bellamy Property Ltd. of Victoria who developed a bare land strata residential community on January 1, 2015.

FAIRBRIDGE FARM SCHOOLS

Established

The Kingsley Fairbridge Farm School	Pinjarra, Western Australia, 1912
The Prince of Wales Fairbridge Farm School	Cowichan Station, V.I., British Columbia, 1935
The Fairbridge Farm School of New South Wales	Molong, New South Wales, 1937
The Northcote Children's Farm	Bacchus Marsh, Victoria, 1937
The Fintry Fairbridge Training Farm	Okanagan Valley, British Columbia 1938

